Federal water legislation raises concerns

Rick Garrick Wawatay News

Grand Chief Alvin Fiddler and Kiiwetinoong MPP Sol Mamakwa recently shared their concerns about the introduction of Bill C-61: First Nations Clean Water Act on Dec. 11. Bill C-61, an Act respecting water, source water, drinking water, wastewater and related infrastructure on First Nation lands, was introduced by Patty Hajdu, minister of Indigenous Services Canada and Thunder Bay-Superior North MP.

"We must remember that there are 13 long-term drinking water advisories in 12 NAN (Nishnawbe Aski Nation) communities, representing over 40 per cent of all long-term drinking water advisories nationally," Fiddler says. "Our leaders have demanded solutions for years, and this goes to the heart of many of our communities' struggles to this day. While most Canadians can just turn on the tap and get clean water, there are many NAN First Nations that continue to suffer the impacts of decades of bad water."

Fiddler says the introduction of the First Nations Clean Water Act is just the first step in the long process of developing standards and regulations for safe, clean drinking water, wastewater and source water that respects the sovereignty of NAN communities.

'We acknowledge that some First Nations have had opportunities for input into the drafting of this legislation, but we do not agree that this legislation has been co-drafted," Fiddler savs. "We do, however, support legislation that enables our communities to develop their own standards and regulations in a manner that encourages them to exercise their sovereignty. We will continue to work to ensure that our federal treaty partner makes every effort to provide adequate and sustainable funding comparable to off-reserve water systems so that our members can finally begin to trust in their water sys-

Fiddler says he was meeting with Neskantaga Chief Chris Moonias and some Neskantaga citizens when the introduction of Bill C-61 was announced. Neskantaga has been on a boil-water water advisory for more than 28 years.

"The general reaction is we feel that our communities were not adequately consulted or involved with the drafting of this bill," Fiddler says. "I know the Assembly of First Nations was there at the table but in terms of actual consultations on the ground we feel that didn't happen. What we said though was that we want to see our communities have more opportunity to be involved in the drafting of the regulations that will support this resolution."

Mamakwa says many First Nations children in Ontario, in Kiiwetinoong and beyond, continue to lack access to clean water, and as a result, they are suffering unnecessary physical and mental health consequences.

"Kiiwetinoong has the highest concentration of long-term drinking water advisories across Canada — of the 26 long term advisories remaining, 13 are found in the Kiiwetinoong riding," Mamakwa says. "Statistics alone do not tell the story of what it's like to live without access to clean water. There are much larger effects on the physical and mental health of those who live without this basic human right and I hear these stories every day from people living across Kiiwetinoong."

Mamakwa says the legislation is one step on a long journey to water justice for the people of Kiiwetinoong who continue to go without access to clean drinking water.

"The leadership of affected First Nations rights holders in Ontario

Grand Chief Alvin Fiddler called for First Nations to have more opportunity to be involved in the drafting of regulations after Bill C-61: First Nations Clean Water Act was introduced in Parliament on Dec. 11.

must be consulted and heard in any future legislative amendment process," Mamakwa savs.

Mamakwa says it was discouraging that none of the First Nations in the north that are on long-term boil water advisories were consulted.

"When we talk about Eabametoong, when we talk about Mishkeegogamang, North Caribou Lake, Bearskin Lake, Sandy Lake, Muskrat Dam, Fort Severn, Deer Lake, North Spirit Lake, Neskantaga, Nibinamik, Slate Falls and Cat Lake, those are the long-term boil water advisories that are there and their voices need to be heard," Mamakwa says. "They need to be heard on the lived experiences that they have on the ground and I think that's a way forward. We need to be able to put some resources on to make sure we eliminate all the long-term boil water advisories."

Haidu savs the First Nations Clean Water Act creates the tools First Nations need to manage their water systems and ensure the water they draw from is safe.

'Created with First Nations, this legislation is the foundation of clean and safe drinking water for generations to come," Hajdu says. "It establishes the rights and supports that should have always been there for First Nations. It holds the federal government accountable to provide sustainable funding so that communities never have to live with unsafe water. And it is thanks to the extensive expertise, work, and guidance of First Nations partners that this legislation will lead to a future where no one has to grow up without clean drinking water ever again."

Some of the key elements of Bill C-61 include: recognition and affirmation of the inherent right of First Nations to self-government, including jurisdiction over water, source water, drinking water, wastewater and related infrastructure on, in and under First Nation lands; rights-based regulatory pathways to protect water and source water adjacent to First Nation lands, in consultation and cooperation with First Nations, other federal ministers, and provinces and territories, to help protect drinking water sources flowing onto First Nation lands; and minimum national standards for the delivery of drinking water and wastewater services on First Nation lands, based on First Nation choice.

Other key elements include: a federal commitment to make best efforts to provide adequate and sustainable funding for water services on First Nation lands comparable to services received in non-First Nations communities; a requirement to provide funding that, as a minimum, meets the commitment expenditures set out in section 9.02(2) of the Safe Drinking Water for First Nations Class Action Settlement Agreement; a requirement for all decisions made under the proposed Act to be guided by the principle of free, prior and informed consent; and a commitment for Canada to support the creation of a First Nations Water Commission that would support First Nations in exercising greater control over drinking water and wastewater services on First Nation lands.

The Safe Drinking Water for First Nations Class Action Settlement Agreement was approved by the Federal Court and the Manitoba Court of Oueen's Bench (now the Manitoba Court of King's Bench) in December

Christmas Aboriginal arts show celebrates 23rd year

Rick Garrick Wawatay News

The coordinator of the 23rd Christmas Aboriginal Fine Arts and Crafts Gift Show and Sale plans to hold next year's event in a larger venue at the Canadian Lakehead Exhibition (CLE) in Thunder Bay. This year's Gift Show and Sale was held from Dec. 2-3 at the CLE's Heritage Building.

"We're moving into the Coliseum at the CLE next year," says John Ferris, coordinator at the Aboriginal Artworks Group of Northern Ontario. "It's a larger venue and we'll have more room for artisans. We had about 40 artisans that wanted to come in on the first day but everything was booked already. So this gives everybody an opportunity to show their artwork and sell their artwork."

Grand Chief Alvin Fiddler, who bought some tamarack geese on the second day of the Gift Show and Sale, looks forward to the new location.

"I was talking to John yesterday and he said they were booking the bigger hall for next December, which will mean more artisans coming out and selling their incredible crafts," Fiddler says.

Janet Napash says this year's Gift Show and Sale was busy and steady all day on Dec. 2.

"It's been great," Napash says. "I'm surprised how many people are coming through today, and people are buying gifts for Christmas. I sold a few of my original paintings so I'm very grateful for that. I like to paint traditional activities so I transfer my work from digital media to fabric art or anything that people could use around the house."

Paul Francis says he sold about 25 of his sweetgrass dreamcatchers on the first day of the Gift Show and Sale.

"Today was super, I did really well," Francis says. "I've been selling my sweetgrass dreamcatchers, I use a full braid of sweetgrass and make dreamcatchers out of them. The braids of sweetgrass have been moving pretty good too and I sold a few of my bone chokers."

Jennifer Bissaillion says the Gift Show and Sale was busy for her as well.

"I love coming to Thunder Bay, I know a lot of Anishinabe people from the northern communities that I ship to all year long," Bissaillion says. "I do embroidery on ladies boots with Anishinabe floral designs. I do matching purses, small, medium, large, I do matching jackets, t-shirts as well, and I customize jackets for First Nations with their corporate logos on them."

Bob Thibodeau says the Gift Show and Sale was pretty good for him, noting that he does scroll saw work with wilderness scenes and Indigenous patterns.

"I started scroll sawing about 35 years ago just doing craftwork," Thibodeau says. "And 22 years ago when John started doing these shows he saw what I made and he was really intrigued in my style of work so I've been participating almost every year since then."

CJ Sagutch says she was selling items made by her family, including her sister, brother, mother and father, at the Gift Show and Sale.

"I have beaded jewellery, necklaces, earrings and other stuff," Sagutch says. "I'm doing good so far, this is my first time

Candace Wesley says she and her husband Peter Wesley, who both work at Wolf Tracks Gallery in Thunder Bay, were selling clothing with his designs and her beadwork and appliqué on pillows.

The sales have been great, we enjoy coming here every year and we are always prepared for this," Candace says. "I started sewing about two months ago and I sold a lot. This work has been passed down to me through my mother-in-law, who does these beautiful wall hangings."

Calvin Redsky says the Gift Show and Sale was pretty good on Dec. 2.

"A lot of the Elders came by that make the moccasins, the mitts and things like that, and when they came here to buy some beads I threw in some leather for them because they are our residential school survivors, so I kind of gave back a little bit too," Redsky says. "They were really happy, they bought my beaver fur and they bought some leather. The beads went for half price. I sold my jingles for half the price, 50 per cent off, so it was a good day."

Audrey Deroy says the Gift Show and Sale was really good

"The last couple of years I've had best time of my life, just being able to see old friends and family and to see all the vendors here," Deroy says. "It just powers me up, the show really does. People from way up north, as far as the land reaches, the people are here with all their handcrafts that they've been preparing for months."

ONWA holds 8th annual poetry night

Rick Garrick Wawatay News

The Ontario Native Women's Association's 8th Annual Strong Hands Stop Violence Poetry Night concluded with a round dance after poetry readings by a variety of poets and songs by musicians Sara Kae and Susan Áglukark. ONWA held Poetry Night in observance of the United Nations International Day for the Elimination of Violence Against Women, and to launch the United Nation's 16 days of activism against genderbased violence #orangetheworld campaign.

"It was just a great way for community to come together here tonight and celebrate each other with our children, our loved ones, our family," says Cora McGuire-Cyrette, CEO at ONWA. "And after especially talking about such a heavy subject, this is what we do as Indigenous people, we celebrate and we dance and that's what healing looks like."

McGuire-Cyrette says she loved hearing the community poems read by poets from the community during Poetry Night.

"I love when women are reclaiming their voice for the first time and being able to share their poetry and their vulnerability in such a safe space," McGuire-Cyrette says. "It means that we've been successful in creating this safe place where women are able to share their voice.'

Lac Seul Elder Catherine Everson stressed during her dance, which was done during one of Aglukark's songs.

"I just enjoyed the round dance," Everson says. "(At) every powwow I go it always makes me feel so proud."

Fort William Chief Michele Solomon also enjoyed participating in the round dance.

"It was really fun, really uplifting and just really good energy," Solomon says.

Solomon adds that Poetry Night provides an opportunity to listen to people who have written songs and poems and stories about their experiences

"Oftentimes those experiences are related to trauma or healing or love," Solomon says. "Jana-Rae (Yerxa, one of the poets) is an amazing storyteller and poet and her poems are always so impactful."

Solomon says the poems by Cher Obediah, an author, filmmaker, artist and speaker from Six Nations and Alderville, were really impactful as well.

"You could really relate to the story that she was telling in her poetry," Solomon says. "I really appreciate and love this event that ONWA hosts every year, it really kicks off the 16 days of activism in a good way and highlights the experiences of violence that Indigenous women have felt and been through."

Obediah says she was grateful to be able to read her poetry at Poetry Night.

"I'm really passion driven, by sharing my messages today based on what I now refer to pain into purpose and sharing my story and really working hard towards eradicating shame for others to help normalize those kinds of conversation and events like this really aid in that," Obediah says. "I started to write poetry because my partner at the time was not really able to accept or hold space for my emotions so I was left invalidated. He would always take everything as criticism so just by nature I started to write poetry to sort of get those emotions out, to sort of self soothe."

Obediah says her book, Shame to Shine, is her diary in poetry.

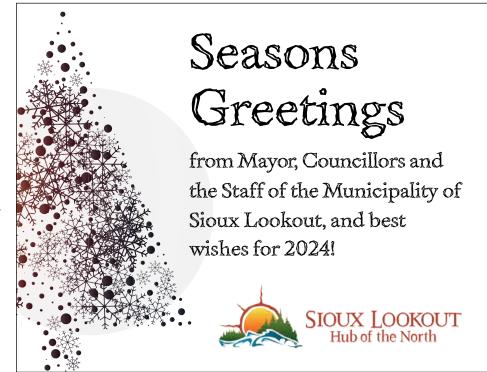

"It is my collection of poems that I wrote while I was in the cycle of domestic violence," Obediah says. "There's 20 poems in each chapter, it's a bit of a sad read in the beginning but you get to the end it's really powerful stuff and I know it's really needed out there."

Kae, a Red Rock Indian Band citizen, says she always loves Poetry Night.

"It feels so great especially on nights like this when there is so much women in the room and so much support and love," Kae says. "It feels great to be able to play my music around other people who create poetry and other types of spaces of creation."

Kae says she sang her recently released song Constellations during her performance.

"It's about finding yourself and wanting to be with someone but realizing that it should not work out and it's good that it didn't," Kae says. "It's a song

oliday Season is here and you can see everyone is excited in the annual high of getting ready for Christmas. Different religions and cultures celebrate this period and some don't at all. I grew up in the remote Indigenous community of Attawapis kat on the James Bay coast and through colonization and the invasion by Christian missionaries my people for many years ended up becoming swept up in either the Catholic or Protestant religions depending on who was doing the the invading. We all became part of this religion and managed also to incorporate some of our own original traditions and culture. However, most of our traditions and cultural practices were banned and considered evil by these new religions.

We all enjoyed Christmas for the excitement of this time and the various celebrations that went on during festivities. This included of course Christmas trees, gift giving, midnight mass at the local church and home visits with family and friends. Along with this time and also as part of the colonization process we became introduced to alcohol and that ended up producing an epidemic of alcoholism and tragedy for my people.

Too many of us recall did ficult times during Christmas. Yes there was some fun and joy in cele-brating this time of the year but once the drinking started many became helpless and all kinds of terrible tragedies occurred. There were all sorts of accidents, violence, crazy situations where people sometimes died, were injured or became incapacitated and ill over time. The alcohol was impossible to contend with and then in the 1970s and 1980s drug abuse became more prominent. Many of our Indigenous communities became dysfunctional and unsafe as alcohol and drugs took over the lives of people. In particular this became a generational process with the young pick-ing up these addictions in their teen years and even as children. Thankfully, today we have made a lot of progress in dealing with the terrible results of colonization and my people are returning to our traditions and culture. We are helping each other in terms of dealing with alcohol and drug addictions through treat-ment programs, traditional healing and education on how addictions work.

These days we have to deal with new and deadly addictions involving opioids. Alarmingly, more than 40,000 people have died of opioids in Canada since 2016 when records first started to be kept. The worst part of this is that prescription drugs produced by big pharmaceuticals and their promotional rela-tionship with the medical community had a lot to do with making these dangerous opioids available to many thousands of people. A great documentary series called 'Pain Killer' on Netflix provides an insight on how this epidemic was manufactured.

We are still dealing with this crisis as it now involves Fentanyl, a very powerful and potent opioid and too many people continue to die, are hospitalized and injured by these devastating drugs. This opioid crisis has dealt a great blow to the public's trust in big pharmaceuticals who are often more concerned with making billions of dollars on drugs and less for the care of patients. Medical professionals were also caught up in the vast marketing scenes run by these drug companies and thankfully due to some good re-porting by journalists, awareness campaigns by activists and the strength of our health care professionals we are now in a more informed and enlightened state when it comes

My hope is that you and your family and friends have a wonderful, safe and happy Holiday sea-son and that you are watching out for those around you. If you think you have a problem with alcohol or drugs then please for the sake of yourself and your family and friends reach out for help. You can contact people in your community who are working in drug and alcohol treatment and prevention as well as local health professionals with addiction knowledge and of course the traditional people that are dedicated to healing our people. This is the time of the year to celebrate this holiday season in any way you desire but make an effort to put smiles on the faces of your children, family and friends and give them a safe and comfortable Christmas. They don't need or deserve the terror of a drug or alcohol fuelled Christmas.

Grand Chief Alvin Fiddler joined with First Nation leaders and representatives of Newmont to celebrate the connection of the Musselwhite mine to the Wataynikaneyap Power system. "The vision of our leaders and Elders was to bring clean reliable power to our communities," said Grand Chief Fiddler. These are opportunities to help our communities grow and become more sustainable, he added, but we (First Nations) need to be in the driver's seat. Our communities need to be in control of what happens in our territories.

Details about Winter Weather

November is technically the final month of the fall season, but usually introduces winter weather. A transition from one season to another implies variety - certainly this was the case last month. Cooler than average conditions prevailed across Northern Ontario in the first week of November

The second week featured winter storm conditions in most parts of the region. A combination of snow and freezing rain forced the cancellation of school buses in the Northwest and from Cochrane to North Bay in the Northeast. Sections of Highway 17 and other roads north and east of Lake Superior were closed to travel because of major snow amounts. These winter-like conditions were followed by rain and then unseasonably warm and some record high temperatures during mid-November. Snow on the ground was reduced to zero in the same areas.

Later November brought colder temperatures and moderate snow to the Northeast. In the Northwest at month end Thunder Bay had zero snow on the ground. Minor snow amounts were reported in other warmer than usual. November was another relatively dry month, especially in the Thunder Bay area. Average temperatures in the Northeast were slightly cooler than average and precipitation was near average.

The first half of December has featured a continuation of warmer and dryer conditions in the Northwest and warmer and near normal precipitation amounts in the Northeast. The most notable warmth took place in Thunder Bay in mid-December. On December 14 the maximum temperature was 14°C. This was 22°C above average and for most of the day Thunder Bay was the warmest location in Canada. A number of new daily maximum records were set across the region in mid-December.

El Niño and Winter outlook

I have been mentioning this meteorological process for several months in this "Weather" column. It is one of my favourite topics: how change in the temperature in the tropical Pacific Ocean, 12 thousand kilometres away, can have profound effects on seasonal weather in Ontario. The temperature cycle includes El Niño, the warm phase, and La Niña, the cool phase. This change or oscillation in sea surface temperatures (SSTs), contributes to weather and severe weather around the world. It influences drought conditions, floods, hurricane and typhoon formation, wildfire seasons and even details of winter in Northern Ontario. These changes in SSTs influence large-scale atmospheric circulation patterns, including the placement of jet streams that transport weather systems.

Typically, a moderate or strong El Niño results in milder temperatures and less snowfall than average in Northern Ontario. Generally, the warmer the SSTs are in the tropical Pacific, the warmer the winter in Northern Ontario. Usually, as has happened this year, the Northwest tends to be warmer and dryer than the Northeast.

It is almost certain that El Niño will continue to play a major role in the coming winter. A substantial area in the Pacific Ocean has continued to warm since last month and is presently 2°C degrees warmer than average. This qualifies as a strong El Niño. The usual pattern is to continue to strengthen for the rest of the winter and into early spring. Previous winters associated with very strong El Niños were in 1997-98 and 2015-16. These winters were at least 5°C warmer than average. This is my prediction for the coming winter but we have to wait until March 1, 2024 to find out -"yes" or "no" for this precise forecast!

Of course, a warm winter helps with heating costs but, as talked about last month, there are implications for ice roads and delivery of supplies to isolated northern communities.

When winter begins

The date for the first day f winter our calendars is Thursday, December 21. Some calendars will indicate the time: 10:27 EST or if you live west of Thunder Bay, 9:27 CST. This is yesterday if you are reading the most recent edition of Wawatay! Of course, if you happen to be in the Southern Hemisphere, or like me have the calendar published by the Australian Weather Bureau, it is not winter at all, it is the beginning of summer with the summer solstice occurring at 2:21 PM Australian Eastern Daylight Time (AEDT).

Another choice is December 1st. Meteorologists and climatologists start winter on the first day of December and end it at midnight on the final day of February. Hmmm, 2024 is a Leap year. We have an extra day of winter on February 29,

More predictions and a wish

The global temperature in 2023 will be the warmest on record. There will be many headlines in the first weeks of January either raising the alarm or downplaying this record.

A few headlines will say that the global temperature in 2023 was effectively 1.5°C warmer than the pre-industrial global average temperature and an increase which countries had agreed in Paris, 2015 to try and

Other headlines and stories will explain that this threshold of 1.5°C was close but we still have more time.

May you and your families have a good and safe holiday and the best of times in the coming year.

Protecting Our Elders Should Be A Priority

think most of us feel like we have been through several very weird years with the Covid19 pandemic, climate change events like the recent forest fire summer and of course the terrible wars raging in Ukraine and Gaza. I wish I could be more optimistic in looking towards the future but it is not easy. The best we can do is just put one foot in front of the other and go on with our lives while being as kind and consider-ate of others as possible. Personally, my big focus is with one day at a time, staying in recovery and main-taining my sobriety.

I am looking at the coming winter with some concern as I hear reports of Covid variants in anoth-er wave of this pandemic and of course the flu as well as other sickness. My partner has a critical lung disease and was severely hit when we both got Covid last year. He is still recovering very slowly and will never be the same. I have what they refer to as long Covid which has triggered arthritis that flares up from time to time now and it is thought to be connected to having had Covid or possibly the vaccine.

Myself and my partner are isolating as much as possible while this period of sickness moves through our area once again. We have lost many over the past years to Covid and other diseases and we are fearful that we will lose many more family and friends this winter. However, we have all just been through a few years of figuring out just how serious Covid and the flu can be and so we should know how to stay safe. Part of keeping safe would have to do with vaccines but at this point I am not suggest-ing what individuals should do as there are still lots of concerning data we don't know about vet in regards to all these vaccines. It is best to check with your doctor.

We also know that being careful, having a good diet and getting regular exercise certainly helps in dealing with any disease that is circulating. It is important to realize that when it comes to Covid19 there are some good solid facts to know. According to the World Health Organization a little more than 53,000 Canadians have died from Covid19.

We also know that most of the deaths overwhelmingly have been in older people and those with comorbidities. There have been very few deaths in younger people and most of the passings occurred in the 65 years and over age category. There is also some thought that a certain amount of herd immunity is now in place and even with new variants serious disease is not being experienced with the young, middle aged and healthy individuals.

With all that information we should understand that if we care about our Elders and older people then we should be careful not to bring them in touch with Covid19.

Even if we are only talking about the seasonal flu we have to realize that it kills mainly the elderly and those with health issues. Depending on the government of Canada statistics from past years the flu kills at least 3,500 people a year that we know of and most of these people are elderly. The thing is that we know it is important to keep Elders and all older people safe from dying of the flu by simply making sure they are not put in situations where they can pick up this contagious disease. That means staying away from Elders and older people and those who have health issues if we are sick. It is up to us during the flu season or a Covid wave not to sponsor and run events that draw Elders and older people together with the larger community.

It might seem like a nice or kind idea to create social gatherings for Elders and older people but really is it worth taking the chance if it puts them in danger? Wouldn't we all want to have a few more good years with these Elders and older people so we can benefit from their wisdom and share their time with grandchildren and family and friends when it is safe to do so? Keeping our Elders safe should be the priority.

Lakehead students hold Indigenous market on campus

Rick Garrick Wawatay News

A variety of Indigenous arts and crafts were featured during the Lakehead University Indigenous Student Resource Centre's Indigenous Christmas Market, held Nov. 30-Dec. 1 at the Agora on the Thunder Bay campus.

"It's good to get out and get a different audience buying my merchandise," says Jessica Mamakeesick (Robinson), owner of Mamakeesick Roots, which is located at the Goods and Co. urban market in Thunder Bay. "I pack up what I can and bring it out so all the students and staff have a chance to see what I offer at my store. I will be at the Indigenous market at the Heritage Building this weekend as well."

Mamakeesick says her paintings feature a Woodland style mixed with modern and her own style of dot art, including a painting she had for sale called Safe Haven.

"It has three bears, a mother or father bear, whatever you want to interpret, and then the two cubs behind it," Mamakeesick says. "It just represents for the protection of the family and just creating a safe haven for your family."

Calvin Redsky says he had a lot of regalia pieces for sale, including dancing sticks, necklaces, belts, earrings, dancing bells and supplies of leather.

"We have some ceremonial supplies like the frying pans and the smudging bowls as well," Redsky says.

Redsky says his family does creative work at home to practice their way of life.

"For our family, it's a way of life," Redsky says. "It's just become a hobby but it's also something that we wanted to share with the rest of the people. Hopefully we kind of bridge that reconciliation through our way of life and sharing stories."

Bess Legarde says her ribbon pillows, which she created to give the feel of ribbon skirts or ribbon shirts, were selling quick.

"It's just kind of mimicking ribbon shirts, ribbon skirts, it's where the inspiration came from to do some pillows," Legarde says. "I just complement the fabric I'm using with each ribbon."

Jerome Wilson says he had earrings, barrettes, lanyards and lighter cases for sale.

"My work is kind of all over, I like to dabble with everything," Wilson says. "My grandmother introduced me to this a long time ago. There's lots of oohs and awes with certain pieces. I like the reaction, it makes me feel confident as a beader, it makes me feel seen."

Marlene Tsun says she had some beaded earrings and barrettes, matching crowns and earrings and ribbon shirts and ribbon skirts for sale.

"I've been doing this for about 40 years now," Tsun says. "My grandmother taught me when I was young. I went back to it when I was about 24. I love beading, I always have and I don't want to stop. Beadwork is comforting and it soothes me and keeps me in touch with the Indigenous culture."

Robyn Bunting says her beaded ornaments make a nice gift for throughout the year.

"It's just a Christmas ornament and then I have the medicine colours on there," Bunting says, noting that she began beading a few years ago when her niece passed away. "I needed to heal, I find that beading helps me heal. I just do it all the time, it occupies my mind. When I think about her when I make the work, it comes with love. And when you're done beading, it's pride after, look at how beautiful that is."

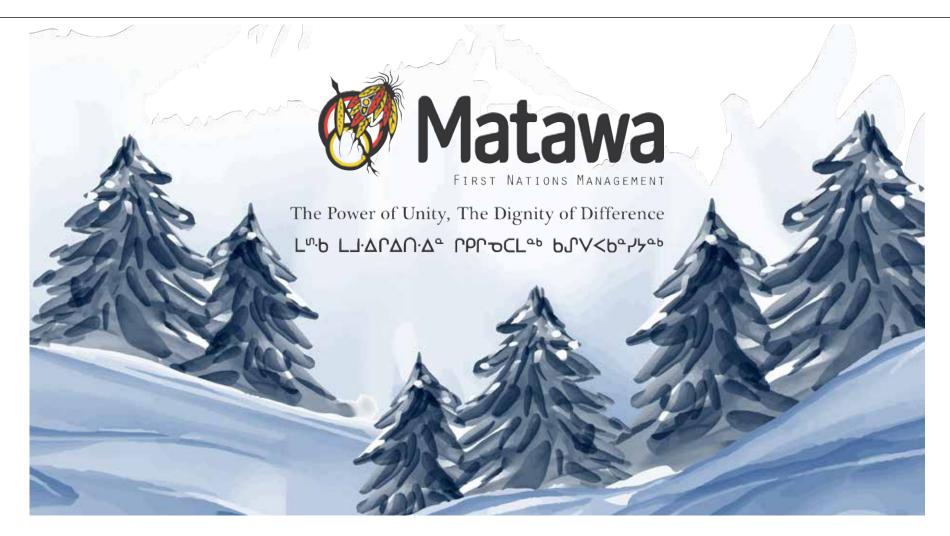

Katie Melnick and Tricia

Sambary had a variety of items for sale, including headbands, neck warmers, hats, slippers, keychains, dish scrubbies, earrings and keychains.

"It's been really good for us," Melnick says. "They love our earrings."

Jesslynn Friday, a first-year Lakehead University Visual Arts student, says she mostly does realistic oil paintings, Anishinabek-based paintings and anime style art.

"I started at 11 and I've been at it ever since because I loved it and didn't want to give it up," Friday says. "I started doing anime when I was in Grade 5 because as a kid it was what I was interested in. People like (my work), they've been looking through my portfolio."

One City Many Voices aims to decrease racism in Thunder Bay

ONWA's Krista Sergerie delivers the Decrease in Racism Especially Targeting the Indigenous Community report at Diversity Thunder Bay's One City, Many Voices A Community Conversation on Diversity gathering at the Oliver Road Community Centre in Thunder Bay.

Rick Garrick Wawatay News

Diversity Thunder Bay's One City, Many Voices A Community Conversation on Diversity included a report on Decrease in Racism Especially Targeting the Indigenous Community on Nov. 15 at the Oliver Road Community Centre in Thunder

"ONWA (Ontario Native Women's Association) has 50 years of experience navigating the racism that Indigenous women face at all levels of society, individually in their daily lives, collectively as a community and structurally through systemic processes," says Krista Sergerie, health project lead for anti-Indigenous racism and discrimination at ONWA, during her delivery of the Decrease in Racism Especially Targeting the Indigenous Community report. "Health care in Canada is a colonial institution and it's evolved in a racist system which historically has placed Indigenous peoples in Indian hospitals where they have often experienced abuse and experimentation. So racism is deeply entrenched in health care settings that often even health care workers are not aware of the ways that it manifests and continues to be perpetrated."

Sergerie says one in three Indigenous adults in Thunder Bay reported that they were treated unfairly by health care professionals because of their Indigenous identity.

"And 66 per cent of Indigenous adults (who) reported experiencing racism from health care professionals said it prevented, stopped or delayed them from returning to those health care services," Sergerie says. "In all, Indigenous women experienced discrimination differently than Indigenous men and non-Indigenous women due to their intersectional identities, both being a woman and Indigenous. So Indigenous women have experienced both racism and sexism in accessing medical care. The racism Indigenous women face in health care systems directly contribute to poor quality care, of complete lack of care resulting in poor health outcomes or even death."

Sergerie says ONWA has engaged community members and has heard countless stories about stigmatization and individual and systematic racism that Indigenous women have experienced and witnessed in health care settings.

"This can discourage Indigenous women and their families (from) accessing the care they need in the future," Sergerie savs. "The death of Joyce Echaquan (a 37-year-old Atikamekw mother of seven who died in a hospital in Quebec in 2020) is a testament to the deadly consequences of sexism, racism and discrimination in health care."

Sergerie says ONWA maintains that Indigenous women have the right to safety in the health care system and the right to high-quality health services throughout their life.

"Some of the solutions that we can discuss today is we need more health services in Ontario that are designed and delivered by and for Indigenous women such as ONWA's Mindimoovenh Health Clinic in Thunder Bay to provide safe spaces for Indigenous women and their families, and we also need sustainable funding so they can continue to offer those safe spaces to women," Sergerie says. "Health system partners must also increase their capacity to create safe and inclusive health services for Indigenous women, so this can be done by acknowledging the racism and discrimination that Indigenous women uniquely experience and providing training on anti-Indigenous racism and bias with a gendered lens delivered by Indigenous women's organizations, developing anti-racism strategies and standards and recruiting and supporting Indigenous health professionals and collaborating with Indigenous partners such as ONWA, listening and learning to Indigenous women's stories and their experiences and establishing accountability mechanisms such as tracking and responding to racist and other discriminatory behaviour."

Sergerie says they also need allies in making the systemic changes that are required to end racism in health care.

"Indigenous women cannot do this alone, so we encourage all to read ONWA's report on Reconciliation with Indigenous Women and journey to safe spaces to learn more about Indigenous women's experiences and recommendations we have," Sergerie says.

The Reconciliation with Indigenous Women report is posted online at: www.onwa.ca/ reports.

The One City, Many Voices A Community Conversation on Diversity also featured reports on Overview of the Community Safety and Well-Being Plan by Lee-Ann Chevrette and Anti-Racism and Inclusion Accord by Norm Gale.

Survivors Secretariat gathering focused on healing

Rick Garrick / Wawatay News

Tanya Talaga, founder and leader of Makwa Creative Inc., delivers her Personal Narrative presentation on the second day of the Survivors' Secretariat Knowledge is Sacred, Truth is Healing gathering.

Rick Garrick

Wawatay News

The Survivors' Secretariat held its Knowledge is Sacred, Truth is Healing gathering from Nov. 28-30 at the the Best Western Plus NorWester Hotel and Conference Centre in Thunder Bay.

"The key point is healing, healing doesn't have to be therapeutic interventions all the time — it has a place, but for survivors the healing is truth telling and taking action to get truth for the children who never came home, the disappeared and those who are now in unmarked burials," says Laura Arndt, secretariat lead at the Survivors' Secretariat, who delivered a Knowledge is Sacred, Truth is Healing presentation during the gathering. "The responses (from the participants) were unbelievably generous and kind, sharing their own healing path, the difficulty that is involved in healing and that healing takes place over time. The other part that is important is that the survivors talk a lot about: 'That's in the past,' and trying to leave it in the past but get the healing that's needed so they can do what they need to do?

Lac Seul Elder Fred Thomas says some of the keys from the gathering were Ryan Shackleton's comments on data and how to do research on missing children during his Truth and Ownership presentation and Tanya Talaga's comments on her family's history during her Personal Narrative presentation.

"Those are the two key areas and also our people disclosing their experience, storytelling about their experience that was really a mover for them to heal," Thomas says.

Shackleton, CEO at No History, says he was honoured to hear what participants had to say about his presentation.

"It's been a real struggle to get this story documented through the archival record," Shackleton says. "As I mentioned in the presentation, the archival record's only a piece of the whole thing, the real thing that we need to do is document these stories and share them widely in Canada. It's a way of combatting denialism, which is growing currently, and I think that more Canadians need to hear these stories."

Shackleton also highlighted comments by former Attawapiskat chief Theresa Spence on his presentation.

"Everyone's comments were meaningful but when she tells those personal stories about not having love in the institutions I have a young family and it makes me think of my family so it hits pretty hard," Shackleton

Roberta Hill, a member of the board of directors at the Survivors' Secretariat, says the loss of learning how to express love to family was one of the cruelest things that was inflicted upon the children who were sent to residential school.

"They really didn't care about our emotional well-being," Hill says. "We had parents that loved us, that nurtured us and that's what was missing at the Mush Hole (Mohawk Institute residential school). They really didn't care about that, you weren't there to be loved and nurtured. It was just a cruel place to have children.'

Hill says her children told her when they were older that she didn't treat them the way she should have.

"I can only say that as a parent, those were the skills that we learned, to be cold, to be distant, to not be loving, so that's where it is," Hill says.

Talaga, founder and leader of Makwa Creative Inc. and author of Seven Fallen Feathers, says her mother was raised on Fort William's traditional territory where Treaty 9 meets Treaty #3 during her presentation.

"My mother is a status Indian, I am a status Indian and that's important to acknowledge, it's important to say that," Talaga says. "I learned that from Elder Claudette Commanda. she started to say that at her speeches every time she gives the keynote and I think we need to say that because we are the people that are the descendants of what has happened in this country, the truth of what has happened in this country, and we need to acknowledge that."

Talaga says her mother was raised by two residential school survivors, but she did not go to residential school.

"She went to school on a train, this train that was in Nakina, was in Sioux Lookout and was in Graham," Talaga says. "There were 14 stops on this train and only one of the 14 stops are part of the (Federal Indian) Day School Class Action, my mother's stop was not. It is important that we acknowledge all of those people that went to the schools, those schools that were recognized by the TRC (Truth and Reconciliation Commission) and those that were not recognized by the TRC, day schools and residential schools."

Talaga also highlighted the importance of her search for her great grandmother Annie Car-

13th annual Mayor's Awards recognize NAN youth council

Rick Garrick Wawatay News

A group of youth from the Regional Multicultural Youth Council (RMYC) and Nishnawbe Aski Nation Oshkaatisak Youth Council were recognized at Thunder Bay's 13th Annual Mayor's Community Safety Awards.

Winner McGuire, a Bingwi Neyaashi Anishinaabek youth and co-president at the RMYC, was recognized with the Young Leader Award, and the Voices of Youth Project by the RMYC in partnership with the Oshkaatisak Youth Council was recognized with one of four Outstanding Community Project awards.

"Miigwetch and congratulations to these young leaders for their outstanding work to improve the lives of young people across the region," says Deputy Grand Chief Bobby Narcisse. "The leadership they have demonstrated is an inspiration to young people across our nations. Voices of Youth is an inspiring project that allows young people to express their concerns and needs. (It is) encouraging to see young people come together to support each other, and we join with municipal officials to celebrate their accomplishments."

The Voices of Youth project was a joint effort by the RMYC and the Oshkaatisak Youth Council to rekindle young people's passion for learning and to combat the disruptive impacts that the COVID-19 pandemic had on young people's education. "Congratulations to our award winners and thank you to all the nominees for all you do in our community," says Acting Mayor Dominic Pasqualino. "City Council is proud to recognize and highlight the impact you continue to make in our city."

McGuire says she was honoured to receive the Young Leader Award. She helps immigrants, Indigenous youth and people of colour navigate societal and institutional barriers and guides them towards a successful future.

"I've been trying to get my voice out there for a long time and now I've overcome the challenges that I needed to in order to get my voice out there and make an impact on the youth," McGuire says. "The project I've been working on is Girl Power/Youth Power. We would gather young kids and we would teach them lessons that they need to know through skits and just storytelling."

McGuire says she is also working to open a Black Youth Group for African and Caribbean youth in Thunder Bay.

"That's going to be a place where we can openly share experiences and learn to overcome them together," McGuire says.

McGuire says it has been a great experience working with all the youth.

"It's a very diverse environment, you're learning something new every day and you learn to co-exist peacefully with all these other cultures," McGuire says.

A group of youth from the Regional Multicultural Youth Council (RMYC) and Nishnawbe Aski Nation Oshkaatisak Youth Council were among those recognized with awards at Thunder Bay's 13th Annual Mayor's Community Safety Awards.

Danika-Lee Banning, a Fort William youth who runs the social media and coordinates volunteers at RMYC, says it felt really good to be recognized with the Outstanding Community Project award.

"As the RMYC we put in a lot of work to make the community a better place and to keep youth off the streets and help them feel more involved in their community and be more connected to who they are as a person," Banning says. "We did Voices of Youth so that we could hear from the youth and see their perspective on things and try to better understand how they feel it."

Teagan Fraser, a Thunder Bay youth and co-president at the RYMC, says it felt good to be recognized with the Outstanding Community Project award.

"We went to different communities to ask youth how COVID impacted their schooling," Fraser says. "And we are working to make it better, so we do peer mentoring in high schools."

Fraser says they helped with the street fair during their trip to Kiashke Zaaging Anishinaabek

"I talked to a few youth about peer mentoring, told them to reach out to me," Fraser says.

Kohen Chisel, a member of the Oshkaatisak Youth Council, says they were grateful to be recognized with the Outstanding Community Project award.

"We're just really happy to be supporting the RMYC and helping the youth overcome barriers with attending secondary school and finding strategies how we can help them succeed better," Chisel says. "We're just really grateful to be supporting the youth and receiving this award to push initiatives like this."

The 13th Annual Mayor's Community Safety Awards also included the Community Hero award which was presented to Jon Green, an active team member of Elevate NWO, and three other Outstanding Community Project awards which were presented to the Expressive Arts Program, People with Lived Experience Advisory Committee and Poverty-Free Thunder Bay. Information about the awards is posted online at: www.thunderbay.ca/ en/city-services/13th-annualmayor-s-community-safetyawards.aspx.

Dilico Christmas Wish 2023

Rick Garrick Wawatay News

Dilico Anishinabek Family Care's 2023 Dilico Christmas Wish Campaign was a success with more than 800 Christmas Wish bags filled for children, youth and babies, exceeding this year's campaign goal. Since the campaign's launch in 2008, more than 9,000 Christmas Wish bags have been filled with essential items, learning tools, warm clothing, books and toys.

"Thunder Bay has once again demonstrated unparalleled compassion, surpassing all expectations and filling over 800 Christmas Wish bags this year," says Sarah Pelletier, assistant director of child welfare at Dilico. "This achievement is a testament to the unwavering support we receive year after year from incredible individuals, community members and various businesses and organizations in our community. Their generosity knows no bounds and (their) overflowing spirit of giving warms our hearts. Being able to not only reach our goal, but exceed it, is truly incred-

Meredith Francis, integrated services team case manager at Dilico and a participant in all 15 Christmas Wish campaigns, says she looks forward to the Christmas Wish campaign year after year.

"It's one of the highlights of what we do, to be able to deliver these bags to children and families is such an incredible experience," Francis says. "These Wish bags are responsible for hundreds of smiles and so much joy during the holiday season. Bags are delivered to children that would not receive gifts otherwise."

Francis says the evolution of the Christmas Wish campaign over the past 15 years has been nothing short of extraordinary.

"From bins to boxes, and now the iconic red Wish bags, our community's response has grown, with the increasing needs we strive to fulfill," Francis says. "I love seeing the Wish bags bringing so much happiness to so many families."

This year's Christmas Wish campaign was supported by Sovereign Dental, Cheadle's Lawyers, Pradal Construction, Unifor, OPG, Creekside Nursery and Garden Centre and Milne Aggregates.

"We're so appreciative of all of these amazing contributions that you could see bought all kinds of extra items," says Blythe Haynen, assistant director of communications at Dilico. "We spend every last one of those dollars that comes in to make sure that kids get a wish this Christmas. We also want to say meegwetch to Goods and Co. for hosting our Christmas Wish tree this year and to Tbaytel for the amazing surprise of filling 50 Wish bags and also to Westland Insurance, LCPS Chartered Professional Accountants and iOptic for joining our 15-year challenge, each filling 15 bags."

Dilico launched this year's Christmas Wish campaign on Nov. 16 with the unveiling of the Dilico Christmas Wish Tree at Goods and Co.

"What sets our campaign apart is the customization," Haynen says. "Each bag is customized for a child featuring a special tag detailing their age, interests and Christmas wishes."

The Christmas Wish bags are delivered to children across the Thunder Bay district, including 13 First Nations.

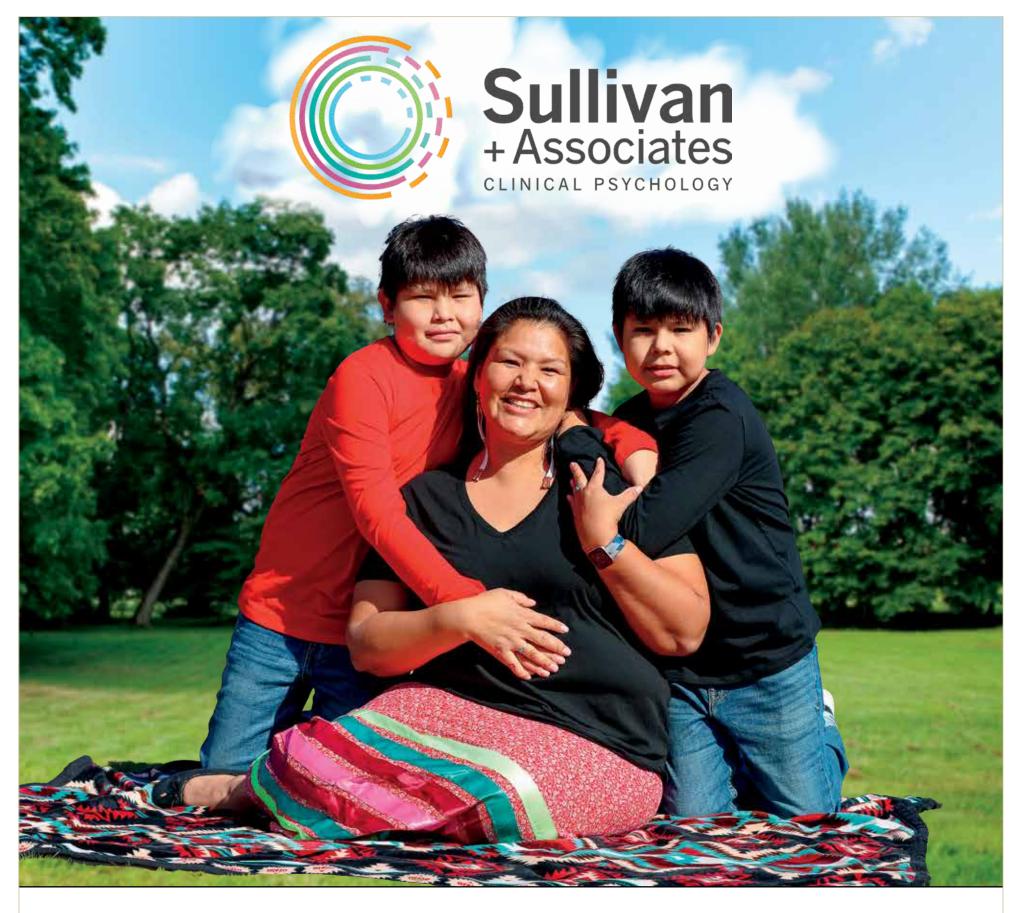

"These expressions of kindness filled with essential items such as warm clothing, books, educational supplies, toys embody the true spirit of giving," Pelletier says. "As our Dilico elves prepare to deliver these gifts throughout the region, we celebrate not just the numbers but the countless moments of joy, hope and smiles we share throughout this Christmas season with children and families. Here's to 15 years of making wishes come true and to the continued legacy of compassion and care in our commu-

Pelletier says the children and youth have been extremely happy to receive the Christmas Wish bags over the years.

"They're smiling, they're very thankful," Pelletier says. "Lots of the gifts are really awesome and the children are just really happy when they get them."

HOW CAN AN ASSESSMENT BE HELPFUL?

Assessments can be helpful when there is an answer needed for an important question, such as:

- What mental health issue am I dealing with?
- Why is it hard to learn in school?
- Why is it hard to remember things?
- Is that fall making it harder for me to think properly?
- Is there a problem with my attention?

Assessments can help you figure out what the issue is and make recommendations to improve issues such as challenges with mental health, improve learning issues, or help with attention and memory issues.

At Sullivan + Associates Clinical Psychology, we offer assessments for:

- Mental health
- Learning
- Attention
- Behaviour
- Autism
- Neuropsychological issues
- FASD

For assessment services for children and adolescents, we are happy to help families access funding through Jordan's Principle.

Four Rivers celebrates mapping day

Rick Garrick Wawatay News

Matawa First Nations' Four Rivers Environmental Services Group celebrated Geographic Information System (GIS) Mapping Day 2023 with the sharing of a Water is Life video on Youtube. The Water Is Life - Empowering Indigenous Knowledge Through GIS video, developed in collaboration with Esri Canada, Global Water Futures and Wilfrid Laurier University, is posted online at: www.youtube.com/watch?v=B6OqlQU87iM&t=294s

"We are pleased to share this collaborative video and are looking forward to celebrating GIS Day with our member First Nations," says Sarah Cockerton, managing director at Four Rivers. "Four Rivers has been working to support our member First Nations in environmental stewardship, including through valuable tools and technology like GIS for over 12 years."

Cockerton says the video captured the essence of Matawa's Water and Environment Gathering, which was held on June 13-15 at Fort William Historical Park in Thunder Bay. It weaves Indigenous and Western science into innovative solutions for natural resource management and empowers Indigenous wisdom with GIS technology telling a story of sustainability and knowledge.

"The gathering itself was kind of the final piece of the Matawa Water Futures project," Cockerton says. "A big piece of that is about celebrating our communities connection to water, wanting and supporting our communities to really lead environmental conversations, kind of lead environmental and science research and (having) community values, community processes and community priorities being at the forefront of all of that."

Cockerton says they also participated in GIS Day at Lakehead University, where they highlighted the use of a Wingtra drone for collecting information that the communities need to make informed decisions.

"We have a fleet of a number of different drones that we're using to make some huge strides for our communities in mapping, it's really a game changer," Cockerton says. "Yesterday at GIS Day there was a lot of students who were pretty excited about seeing the drone there and they were pretty excited about that at the (Water and Environment Gathering) in June as well."

Cockerton says the Wingtra drone is a fixed-wing drone that employs a vertical takeoff and landing.

"It's awesome — because it's fixed-wing, it's a lot faster, it gets the mapping job done much quicker," Cockerton says. "One of the big quad copters we have can maybe do a little bit more adverse weather, but anytime we can run the fixedwing that's our preferred drone for mapping."

Cockerton adds that Four Rivers is the first Indigenous distributor of the Wingtra drone in the world.

"We loved it so much that we kind of developed a partnership with the manufacturer and that way we can control our own supply line on parts and things we need related to it," Cocker-ton says.

Four Rivers uses GIS to empower the Matawa communities by facilitating community-led research and decision-making; supporting research and field work for Environmental Guardians; fostering collaboration among Indigenous groups; and advancing environmental stewardship initiatives.

"We know that our communities are already experiencing a lot of change, a big thing driving that change as we know is climate change, but we anticipate a lot more change in the future," Cockerton says, noting there is always ongoing talk of the development of the Ring of Fire and other mining and resource projects across northern Ontario. "Having the ability to collect environmental information so that you can quantifiably know and have documented how things are right now and then the ability to continue to collect that so you can monitor change over time becomes very important. To adapt to change, to be able to plan for the future, there needs to be a good understanding of what we've got and how it's changing so that communities can really lead those conversations and make the decisions that they need to be able to make related to their home-

A Christmas message from our Executive Director Thelma Morris

Our children are sacred gifts

One of our nine values at Tikinagan is spirituality. From our Indigenous culture and traditions, this value was taught and passed down by our Elders who believed that all people are spiritual beings and that our children are sacred gifts from the Creator. Tikinagan respects all spiritual beliefs, and we believe everyone has the right to choose their own spiritual beliefs and spiritual practices.

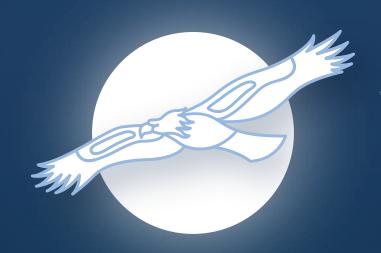

This Christmas season, I reflect on my own spiritual traditions, the birth of Jesus Christ. I think about Mary, a young woman who was not only given the task to birth this holy baby, but to become a new mother. Standing by her side was her partner Joseph, who would become a step-father and role model to the boy. These two humble individuals raised a child who would change the world.

But they were never alone in their parenting journey. Even before he was born, others were there to help. The Inn Keeper gave them a place to stay, and the Three Wise Men and Shepherds were called to Bethlehem to witness and rejoice in the birth of Christ. As he travelled with his family and lived in his community, there were people who knew Jesus as a boy.

This biblical story is an example of our service model Mamow Obiki-ahwahsoowin, which means "everyone working together." Mamow Obiki-ahwahsoowin is rooted in our traditional customs of caring for children. In our culture, children are sacred gifts from the Creator, not only to the family but also to the larger community of extended family members. Everyone shares in the responsibility of protecting and caring for our children.

As I think about our children and youth in our all communities across Northwestern Ontario this holiday season, I am thankful for everyone who has a part in their lives. I'm thankful for all the parents, kookums and moshooms, aunties and uncles, cousins and siblings, our foster families, our staff, and Elders. On behalf of our Board, miigwetch for being present in the life of a young person, the sacred gift from the Creator. Merry Christmas and Happy New Year to you and yours.

Thefma

Wishing you the warmth of family, the joy of traditions and blessings of the Creator this holiday season.

Constance Lake brothers making use of Underground Gym

Rick Garrick Wawatay News

A group of youth, including two brothers from Constance Lake, are enjoying boxing at the Underground Gym and Youth Centre at its new location on Victoria Ave. in Thunder Bay.

"I've been coming here since I was 12," says Christian Sutherland, a Constance Lake youth. "When I just turned 16 I came here, I wanted to compete competitively in the amateur devision.'

Sutherland says he will be travelling to Duluth, Minnesota with a group of youth from the Underground Gym for a boxing competition in early December.

"I have my first fight coming up next Friday (Dec. 1)," Sutherland says. "I've been working out constantly, like five times a week, 14 hours together, in the gym and just mentally preparing. I've been doing body workouts, cardio workouts and sparring."

Zander Sutherland, Constance Lake youth, says he began going to the Underground Gym after school when he was about 14-years-old at the previous Simpson St. site.

"It's pretty good now, there's lots of stuff going on every day," Zander says. "I'm supposed to be in a fight in Duluth on Friday but I couldn't find a match. I had to cut down weight to 200 pounds, I've already lost 21 pounds. I'm just maintaining my calories, 1,700 I went to Orillia for the Winter per day, and training."

Zander says some of the advantages of training at the Underground Gym include improvements in confidence and cardiovascular fitness.

"You'll build confidence and you'll get your cardio up," Zander says. "A lot of people come here nowadays, it's pretty good seeing a lot of people sparring."

Zander says Peter Panetta, founder and operator of the Underground Gym and Youth Centre, is a pretty good coach.

"He taught me the most that I need to know," Zander says. "I'm preparing and ready for the amateur fight. My future goal is probably to hit the nationals.'

Nicholas Rose Stolz, a Thunder Bay youth, says he has been going to the Underground Gym for more than a decade since he was eight-years-old.

"I went to the gym because I was originally bullied just to learn how to defend myself," Stolz says. "I came back and just did it as fun, and then I got really into it with my two Stolz says he's also looking forward to the boxing competition in Duluth.

"I've been training very hard, eating right," Stolz says. "At the start of the camp I was about 150, I didn't have to lose too much, probably about five-10 pounds. I'm very excited, this is my second match. The first time Games, that one went very well. I didn't win but I learned a lot, I got a silver medal."

Panetta says the Victoria Ave. site is a fantastic location, adding that there is no cost for the

"The only drawback about this one is we have no yard whatsoever," Panetta says. "This is not the safest area in town so we try to keep them inside doing something. There's a music (room), there's even a hairdressing salon."

Panetta says some of the youth who used to train at the Underground Gym before the COVID-19 pandemic came back with some of their friends.

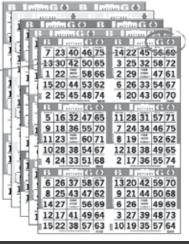

"They're extremely talented and it didn't take them long to get to the competitive level," Panetta says. "There's a club show going on in Duluth on Dec. I and we're heading out there, for most of them, their first match. They're very excited and I have every intention of taking them to a big tournament in Brampton at the beginning of February."

Panetta says they also have art classes, beading and a guitar instructor who has been helping the youth with their music.

"The opportunities are there, if you want it it's here," Panetta says. "I try to give them as much of a variety as I can and some of them excel at certain things and others excel at other things."

Algonquin Public School dances in the season with winter Powwow

Rick Garrick Wawatay News

Algonquin Avenue Public School's Winter/Biboon Pow Wow was a success with three drum groups in attendance along with students from Algonquin and neighbouring schools on Dec. 13 in Thunder Bay.

"It was really nice, I like this," attending powwows like this," says Cameron Pelky, a dancer from Kiashke Zaaging Anishinaabek who began dancing again about two years ago after following the powwow trail as a young child. "I try to attend school powwows to show (our) dancing, trying to heal our generation from intergenerational trauma. Seeing all the kids that were involved, it was really nice and, honestly, it made me emotional."

Pelky says being back on the powwow trail feels "really nice."

"It feels really like healing, it's nice to be involved with people, especially meeting new dancers and drummers and seeing the younger generation drum, Pelky says.

Brandon Britt, a dancer from Long Lake #58 who has been on the powwow trail since 2012, says he attended the powwow at his daughter's request.

"She goes to school here and she loves powwows and she loves coming to dance," Britt says. "I wore my bear hide that was gifted to me a while back. We need more of this for every season at the school, and other schools should follow its exam-

Orville Councillor, a drummer from Northwest Bay who teaches history, language, drumming and singing at five schools including Algonquin, says he aims to make people aware of the Anishinabek culture at an early age.

"It was really nice to see the participation here, it's just beautiful to see all the participation from all the different schools that were represented here today," Councillor says. "And the dancers that came out and the community members that supported this, we want to thank them so much, that was awesome."

Councillor says he has been teaching students about the big drum for the past three years at Algonquin.

"I just share what I'm supposed to share and that's the way our ways are," Councillor says. "If you don't share it, you're going to lose it."

Councillor says the students have learned how to take care of the drum.

"That's one of the first things they are taking care of," Councillor says about the student drummers after the powwow ended. "You're going to see someone pick up everything there around the drum."

Corine Bannon, Native language teacher at Algonquin who is from Fort William, says the powwow brings the community and students together.

"I call it calling back our spirit, getting our kids back into culture, tradition and language," Bannon says. "When you see them practicing the culture and language, you see that rejuvenation, that energy, and they're happy and they're excited and they want to be here. We had so many students dancing, it was incredible."

Bannon says the powwow is growing, noting that they usually have one drum in atten-

"To have three drums and to have that connection with Hammarskjold, when our students graduate from Grade 8 they go to Grade 9 in Hammarskjold, and they have the same kind of programming so they are able to keep drumming," Bannon says. "Our boys have their role on the big drum, but now our girls, their gift was the hand drum, so they are also now learning all the traditional songs on the hand drum."

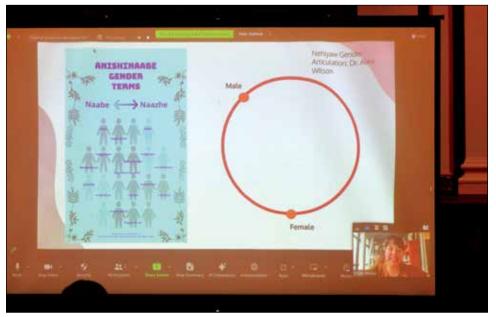

Darren Lentz, principal at Algonquin, says the powwow was amazing.

This powwow showed the community support for the school and it brought community together, and we had lots of student dancers too, which was really nice to see," Lentz says. "And the main thing is we also had student drummers, we had drummers from Hammarskjold, from Algonquin and from McKellar school. They're all gathering around the drum, they're all dancing, they're all proud to dance and it's beautiful to see."

NAN education partnership program holds 2SLGBTQQIAP + Allies gathering

Rick Garrick Wawatay News

Eabametoong's Riley Yesno delivered a keynote presentation on Indigenous Queerness at the Nishnawbe Aski Nation Education Partnerships Program's Educators as 2SLGBTQQIAP+ Allies gathering, held Dec. 6-7 at the Courthouse Hotel in Thunder Bay.

"We've always had a very expansive sense of what gender could be," Yesno says. "It's a very recent phenomena actually that we see pushback against with people saying there is only male, there is only female. But that's not representative of how we understood gender for most of the time."

Yesno says Nanabozho is often referred to as a shape-shifter in stories, including being referred to sometimes as a man, sometimes as a woman or sometimes as an animal.

"So when I hear this and I think about this, I think about all the ways that gender for Nanabozho is not fixed," Yesno says. "Part of that is what makes Nanabozho so sacred and so beyond us, so I think when we start paying attention to the way we tell stories, and some of our most revered figures in storytelling, we'll start to see queerness come out."

Yesno adds that University of Saskatchewan researcher Alex Wilson was taught that gender is like a circle.

"And that male and female are just two points on a circle," Yesno says, noting that the two points are not necessarily across from each other. "But they can move and they're all valid and necessary but they are just two points on this whole picture. So the idea being that again this is not a binary world we're working in."

Yesno says the term twospirit is attributed to Elder Myra Laramee, who proposed it in 1990 during the Third Annual Inter-tribal Native American, First Nations, Gay and Lesbian American Conference in Winnipeg.

"...Male and female are just two points on a circle..."

– Riley Yesno

"She mentioned that she'd had this dream where she had not one but was two-spirit, that represented to her femininity and masculinity and that she said they co-existed within her," Yesno says. "We talk about the very practical need for it — it was a way to represent a specific experience that so many Indigenous people were having."

The first day of the gathering also featured presentations on Creating Safer Spaces: an Introduction to 2SLGBTQ-IAP+ Education by Logan McIvor and Jayal Chung, from the Thunder Bay Indigenous Friendship Centre, and Honouring Journeys: A Mental Health Approach to Supporting 2SLGBTQQIA+ Students in Education by Jennifer White, from Dorset Pier Mental Health.

"What a lot of people are starting to be more aware of and being educated about is putting 2S at the front honours the fact that two-spirited people and Indigenous people were here first on Turtle Island," McIvor says. "So it is important to put that at the beginning when you're saying the acronym and acknowledging that our Indigenous people were here first."

Chung says the Q stands for Queer and Questioning and the I stands for Intersex.

"Questioning kind of describes some of that process of maybe a young person is just kind of coming to awareness about their sexuality, how they identify in terms of their gender," Chung says. "Intersex is a general term used for a variety of conditions in which a person is born with reproductive or sexual anatomy that didn't seem to fit the typical definition of female or male, so may have mixed or mosaic kind of reproductive anatomy."

The second day of the gathering featured a scheduled Student Panel led by emcee Sandi Boucher, a presentation on Navigating 2SLGBTQI+Life and Creating Positive Safe Spaces by Ash Moreau and a Sharing Circle and Grounding led by Boucher.

The gathering also featured opening and closing prayers by Elder Sam Achneepineskum and opening remarks by Sherry Britton, director of education at NAN.

Teach for Canada launches northern educator webinar

Rick Garrick Wawatay News

Teach For Canada-Gakinaamaage held A Day in the Life of a Northern Educator webinar on Dec. 13 as part of its recruitment process for teachers who are interested in teaching in northern First Nations. Applicants must be certified to teach in a Canadian province or territory or graduating from a Canadian teacher education program by August 2024, and they must have legal working status in Canada for the two-year commitment.

"There is a major teacher shortage happening now across Canada where there just simply are not enough certified teachers to fill the available positions, which is significantly impacting all school boards across the country," says Robert Lanni, senior teacher recruitment manager at Teach for Canada-Gakinaamaage. "On Nov. 2, the Ontario Principals' Council highlighted the teacher shortage crisis. Teach For Canada-Gakinaamaage stands in solidarity, emphasizing the alarming impact on First Nations schools. When it comes to First Nations schools and especially in remote communities like the ones we do serve, these issues exist and the crisis is even more severe."

Lanni says Teach For Canada-Gakinaamaage has released a full statement on the teacher shortage crisis on its Facebook page at: www.facebook.com/ teachforcanada.

"First Nation schools we serve experience daily shortages, class cancellations, unqualified staff, 98 recorded mid-year vacancies affecting thousands of students, only half of last year's vacancies were filled and 21 per cent of those were unfilled teaching positions," Lanni says. "We outline in our statement a series of steps that we urge the federal and provincial governments to implement in order to combat this crisis. From a recruitment perspective, this includes things such as fast tracking certification for new graduated and foreign-trained teachers as well, returning to one-year teacher college degrees and increasing the number of teachers being granted certification, creating secondment opportunities for public school teachers to go north."

Lanni says Teach For Canada-Gakinaamaage is a charity that was founded in 2015 to support teacher recruitment and retention in northern remote First Nations.

'One of the First Nations we served had not had in-person school for a number of years," Lanni says. "They simply did not have the teachers to operate, but we are happy to say that the last school year they were able to reopen the school as a result of working with Teach For Canada-Gakinaamaage to have teachers to staff the posi-

Malcolm Payne, a Teach For Canada-Gakinaamaage alumni from the 2016 cohort who taught Grade 7/8 for two years in Ojibways of Onigaming, says the school had a big focus on traditional life and school and community working together.

"In the area we lived in, there was a lot of hunting tourism and I made friends with a hunting guide in the community," Payne says, noting that the guide donated two deer to the school. "So we pulled them in, strung them up and then we got the whole class involved. We skinned it, we kept the (hide) to make drums, we had someone in who knew how to do that (hide) treating process, and we butchered the meat and (donated) it around to community members."

Police Chief Fleury gives lecture on mental health

Rick Garrick

Wawatay News

Thunder Bay Police Chief Darcy Fleury spoke about mental health in policing to kick off Confederation College's Lecture Series - Talking about the Tough Stuff on Dec. 5 in the Dibaajimogamig (Lecture Hall). The lecture series was presented by the Confederation College Alumni and Rotary Clubs of Thunder Bay.

"In the last 15 or 20 years police departments have really put an emphasis on mental health of their employees," says Fleury, a Métis citizen from Manitoba who previously served with the RCMP for 36 vears, most recently as RCMP district commander - chief superintendent for the Central Alberta District based in Edmonton. "Prior to that it never happened, it just wasn't really something we ever spoke about, it wasn't something that we ever really paid attention to."

Fleury says that all changed about 15-20 years ago with the implementation of programs by police departments.

"We do pay attention quite closely to what our people are going through and we find ways to help them deal with the challenges that they have and if they are suffering through some form of mental health injury, to find the supports that they need to help them get better," Fleury says. "We never had that for many years, but one of the programs we have here in Thunder Bay, and this is likewise to many different departments across the country, is a peer-to-peer pro-

Fleury says the peer-to-peer program provides the employees with the supports they need, including nurses, physicians and psychiatrists.

"It's getting to the point that we want to expand it with other agencies because other agencies, they have some of the same sort of concerns that we do," Fleury says. "So we want to expand that a little bit so there's a wider range of people who can go to it if they want to look for some supports there."

Fleury says the Road to Mental Illness is one of the programs he has been interested in over the past few years.

This program is probably one of the best days I've spent in all my time in the service," Fleury says, noting that participants learned the signals and signs of people who are going through some form of a mental struggle. "And to help them right off the bat so we can get them to the places they need. So I want to get that program and I want to kind of think about developing something like that here in our community with our officers. Over the last few years the PTSD (post-traumatic stress disorder) has skyrocketed, that's common across any police agency throughout North America."

Fleury says the number of employees with PTSD has gone up at the Thunder Bay Police Service.

"The main goal is to get them back, make sure they are safe and that they come back to work," Fleury says. "When we talk about the cases in PTSD, it's a wide variety of the severity of the injury that that person has."

Sharon Hollinsworth, president at the Lakehead Rotary Club, says the first lecture went very well.

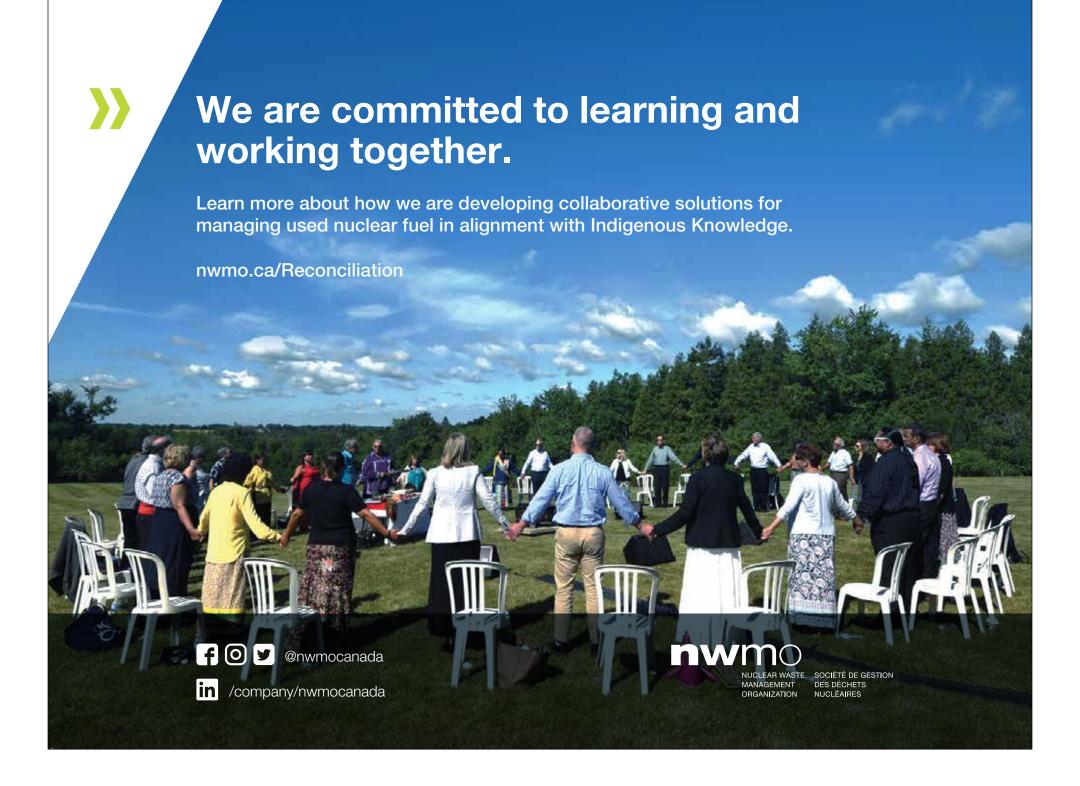

"The series is called Talking about the Tough Stuff, and that's what we did tonight," Helmsworth says. "I think the citizens of Thunder Bay should feel very encouraged with the direction he is going in, looking after his staff, talking about mental health and just working with the other services in our city to provide better support for not only the police officers but the citizens of Thunder

Kathleen Lynch, president at Confederation College, says it was important to talk about the tough stuff during the lecture.

"These kind of conversations are important now more than ever as people struggle with mental health and community connections post-pandemic," Lynch says. "Our college is trying to become a place that values community and connection. We seek to create an environment where everyone can thrive, and that often means addressing difficult topics like mental health, an issue that affects or will affect all of us directly or indirectly in our

Matawa and SLFNHA organize Diabetes Day walk

Rick Garrick Wawatay News

The Matawa Health Cooperative (MHC) and Sioux Lookout First Nations Health Authority (SLFNHA) held their 2nd World Diabetes Day Awareness Walk on Nov. 14 at the Intercity Shopping Centre in Thunder Bay. World Diabetes Day, which had a theme this year of Empowering Global Health, has been observed since 1991 to draw attention to the global epidemic of diabetes.

"I am reiterating the call for more needing to be done to prevent and control diabetes which is growing amongst young Indigenous people within the Matawa region where access to quality resources, education and diabetes management teams are limited," says David Paul Achneepineskum, CEO at Matawa First Nations. "Our people continue to exponentially experience the markers in pre-diabetes and Type 2 diabetes as a result of past/ongoing intergenerational trauma they are experiencing. This continues to cause physiological adaptations that increases the tendency towards obesity, greater insulin sensitivity, lower insulin levels and lower basal metabolic rates."

Achneepineskum says diabetes is an ongoing issue in the Matawa communities.

"Many of our people have been impacted by diabetes, some very tragically," Achneepineskum says. "It's young people now too — they're losing limbs, it's affecting their eyesight. It affects the whole family and the whole community."

Cheryl Schultz, registered nurse and certified diabetes educator at Matawa Health Cooperative, says World Diabetes Day is a day to bring awareness to the number of people who have diabetes.

"At Matawa we service nine communities, five of them are fly-in so we're working in the remote north and the challenges that have been there for years are still there today," Schultz says. "That includes some communities that don't even have access to a grocery store, they have to fly in their groceries."

Schultz says they also have to deal with the high cost of foods in the north.

"So we have to work with those challenges and try and help them to cook better and get better nutrition," Schultz

Schultz says exercise is also one of the tools to manage diabetes.

"What we do and how much we move our body is a really important factor in managing diabetes," Schultz says. "Some of the communities have actually started walking groups where they get up in the morning and they all walk. They started a couple days a week and some of them have taken off and done that every day and their sugars are well managed.

They don't even sometimes need their medications anymore."

Schultz says some of the cases of diabetes in youth is due to diet.

"A lot of it now is due to our handheld devices and sitting, being sedentary and not being active like we once were," Schultz says. "Some of the younger kids are OK, but when they get to those teen years and things change in their life, they just aren't moving enough and we're seeing 12 and 13-year-olds with really high A1Cs (test results for average blood sugar levels)."

Sterling Finlayson, support worker at Matawa Health Cooperative and Lang Lake #58 citizen, says he participated in the walk to network with the other organizations in attendance and because some of his family members have diabetes.

"I want to educate myself so I could prevent that for myself as well," Finlayson says, notWorld Diabetes Day 2023

ing that his position at Matawa Health Co-operative is an advantage because he is surrounded by educational material about diabetes as well as nurses, dieticians and physicians. "I'm trying to look at prevention and I'm trying to look at exercising more as I get older. Diet is a big thing too because exercise won't be the only thing that will help me, I'm going to have to combine a couple of things."

The Diabetes Day Awareness Walk included information booths, a pre-walk warm-up exercise and a cool-down in addition to the walk inside the Intercity Shopping Centre.
